KF Introduction to NHG

Chs. 9-10: *Self-Effacing Solution and Morbid Dependency*¹

Last week we looked at the expansive solution to our conflicts and insecurity. This week I'd like to show you how the self-effacing solution is no healthier; in fact, it is the least satisfactory solution for managing anxiety and for functioning in society. While appearing humble and spiritual, self-effacing people sacrifice their own development and growth for the sake of a family, a cause, a job, or a religious institution. They are gripped by the compulsive need to be helpless, dependent, and self-sacrificing, and they have strong taboos about confrontation and self-assertion. Self-effacing types allow situations and people to devour their time, attention, and resources because they have a need to see themselves as generous, good, and unselfish. Taboos against self-assertion make them very vulnerable to exploitation, and they often feel resentful when others cannot guess what they want or need and don't offer them the care that they crave. Their pride is invested in the illusion that they are loving, caring and in need of care. When circumstances threaten to expose this illusion, their pride blinds them to the truth. When threatened, self-effacing people compulsively and unconsciously resort to strategies like dishonesty and manipulation. Their default reaction is to accuse others and excuse themselves. These devices help them function in the world and preserve their private fiction that they are saintly, loving, and good.

It is difficult to get an honest or direct response from a self-effacing person, and this evasion of the truth often deludes or frustrates those around them. Plain speaking is rarely an option for this type because their ability to recognize and express their own reality has atrophied. They don't even know what their reality is! They have a taboo about truth in general, and this taboo serves their idealized search for glory. In order to force others to solve their problems and rescue them, they create an illusion of helplessness, which, in particular, attracts expansive types who are looking for opportunities to assert their authority and take control. Self-effacing types avoid the challenge of personal development and therefore forfeit the opportunity to discover who they actually are. When an institution or another person chooses not to take responsibility for the self-effacing type's problems or doesn't offer them the support they believe they deserve, self-effacing people see themselves as abused victims of all the unloving, selfish, and evil people in the world. They find it impossible to learn, grow, or explore their options since they believe that everywhere they turn they will find difficulties and oppression. Self-effacing people naturally assume the role of the victim. In fact, feeling and acting like a victim is one of the most prevalent characteristics of this type.

Satan tried to persuade Jesus to jump off the temple to prove or test God's ability to miraculously rescue Him. Self-effacing neurotics are temple-jumpers. They actively get themselves into difficulties and then hope that God and others will take care of them. Special attention reinforces their belief that they are spiritual and valuable.

King Saul was self-effacing. He was chosen by God to rule Israel, but he refused to grow into the shoes of a king. Saul's chronic inability to withstand negative public opinion undermined his development as a leader. As his self-hate grew, he imagined himself to be the victim of an expansive type who both fascinated and terrified him. Saul made no effort to be honest with God and was not interested in discovering what God in mind when He made him king.

Self-effacing types suffer more than the other types and are, therefore, more interested in changing their lives. With God's guidance and care, and through their own KF work, they can learn to take responsibility for themselves, develop interdependence in the community, and discover their unique contribution in the world.

Chapter 9: *The Self-Effacing Solution*¹

0:00 Weekly/0:00 Weekend Intensive (WI)

Lead Facilitator starts the recording by pressing *9.

“Welcome everyone to the session 9 of the KF Neurosis and Human Growth book study. We will begin by reading the Introduction to this chapter.”

Support Facilitator reads the Introduction.

Lead Facilitator: “Thank you. Let’s go to Presenting. When you give us your name and location, you might also share what you love about someone you love. I will begin.”

“My name is _____. I am calling from _____ and what I love about someone I love is _____.”

- Facilitators open the NHG Spreadsheet to record attendance and homework completion.
- Each facilitator makes a list of the names of students as they present.
- Lead facilitator prepares group divisions while students present.
- Lead facilitator assigns groups and says, “To leave the main group, press *3 and then, when prompted, enter your group number. To return to the main group, press 3.”
- Each facilitator asks, “Is there anyone who has not filled out their reading guide?”
- Each facilitator assigns the first 10 questions to two students, 5 questions each. Continue to answer the questions in sets of 10, assigning 5 questions per student in rotation.

Questions 15 and 28 are open questions to the whole group, and there are no correct answers.

0:15/0:15 WI

1. What is the second major solution for inner conflicts? (214.1)

The self-effacing solution.

2. This solution represents a move in what direction? (214.1)

A direction that is opposite to the expansive solution.

In fact, the salient features of the self-effacing solution come immediately into clear relief when we see them in the light of this contrast with the expansive solution.

3. What do expansive types glorify and cultivate in themselves? (214.2)

Everything that means mastery.

For mastery types, suffering is felt as a disgrace to be concealed. They are loath to see their shoulds or to admit that they are shoved around by them. They have an easier time seeing their pride. Self-effacing types are the opposite. They can’t see their pride but are very aware of their shoulds. (215.2)

4. How do mastery types tend to relate to others? (214.2)

They tend to manipulate or dominate others and make them dependent upon them.

5. What is abhorrent to mastery types? (214.2)

The idea of being compliant, appeasing, or dependent.

In fact, they abhor many of the choices and behaviors that are necessary for maintaining or restoring relationships.

6. What must self-effacing people not feel? (215.3)

They must not feel consciously superior to others or display any such feelings in their behavior.

Roles in organizations and in business that require superiority to others are very difficult for this type. Self-effacing types often have strengths that they will not use, develop, or even recognize. Their unwillingness to take charge or earn substantial incomes can erroneously be regarded as humility.

7. What does the self-effacing type cultivate and unwittingly exaggerate? (215.3)

Helplessness and suffering.

8. What do self-effacing people long for? (215.3)

Help, protection, and surrendering love.

9. The self-effacing person lives with what diffuse sense? (215.4)

A diffuse sense of failure.

They can never measure up to their shoulds.

One student said, "The feeling of failure can get so strong that I want to stay in bed rather than go on failing."

10. What does the diffuse sense of failure tend to make self-effacing people feel? (215.4)

They tend to feel guilty, inferior, and contemptible.

11. How do self-effacing people externalize their self-hate and self-contempt? (215.4)

They believe that others are accusing or despising them.

It is difficult to redirect or correct self-effacing types because they see corrections or suggestions as accusing or despising. Correction hurts their pride because they claim to be amenable and well intentioned. How dare others correct them! Correction also stirs up their self-hate. They believe that they shouldn't need correction because in their minds they are living in perfect harmony with others. Correction brings to awareness their chronic and diffuse sense of failure and guilt.

12. How have self-effacing people solved their inner conflict? (216.1)

By suppressing all expansive attitudes and drives and making self-abnegating trends predominant.

This makes it difficult for the self-effacing type to take any credit for success.

13. How does this type feel about any wish, striving, or reaching out for more? (218.1)

Wishes, strivings, or reaching out for more feels like a dangerous or reckless challenging of fate.

They should be content with little.

A self-effacing KF member used this story to avoid building a business: "If I start this business, it will take over my life." He was obsessed with stories about how people in business fail or are no longer “nice” people. He was afraid that his business would control him and he felt helpless.

0:20/0:20 WI

14. For self-effacing types, “selfishness” includes what? (218.2)

Doing anything that is just for themselves.

The taboo on doing something for themselves makes it difficult to get help, go to therapy, take time to train in KF, or nurture themselves. All that would feel selfish.

15. Which of these self-effacing characteristics do you recognize in yourself or others? (217.4–219.4)

Open this question to the group.

- Content with little and avoids budgeting or saving
- Resists improving physical appearance by dieting or exercise, or by dressing well
- Believes that self-analysis or KF work is selfish
- Sharing pleasure is an absolute must; only shared pleasures can be enjoyed.
- Cannot spend money on oneself but lavishly spends on others
- Always doing things for others but unable to do things for oneself
- Cannot express hostility except when emotionally upset
- Afraid of the hostility of others, so prefers to ‘give in’, understand, and forgive
- Cannot carry a grudge consciously, and vindictive drives remain unconscious
- Passive-aggressively and often unconsciously undermines others
- Very difficult to stand up for themselves, to criticize, reproach, or accuse, or even ask to be paid!
- Control by vagueness

16. When is the only time that this type can express hostility? (219.2)

When emotionally upset.

One student said, “When I become hysterical, then I am dangerous.”

17. Why are self-effacing people poor fighters? (219.2)

Because they are afraid of fighting or even friction.

They cannot stand up for their dislike of a person, an idea, or a cause and they cannot keep up a sustained hostility or carry a grudge. The self-effacing taboos on assertiveness interfere with their ability to express a preference or fight for their preference.

Holding a grudge might be understood in a positive light as remembering that someone is untrustworthy and then using anger to help maintain a boundary with that person. A self-effacing person will continue to allow untrustworthy people to harm them. They are always allowing others to have too much control and then hoping that others will change their behavior. Self-effacing people maintain untrustworthy relationships because they secretly need to be abused.

18. The taboos and self-minimizing of the self-effacing type constitute what process? (219.3)

A shrinking process.

19. What fear is specifically indicative of self-effacing trends? (220.1)

The fear of ridicule.

Attracting public ridicule or shaming is the unforgivable sin. The actual event rarely does much harm, but the intense feelings of ridicule and hurt felt by self-effacing types make the event very harmful in their estimation.

Ridicule is especially painful because they are depending so much on the opinion of others to give them a sense of value. Someone's thoughtless or innocent words can rip away their self-worth.

20. While curtailed in any pursuit on their own behalf, what are self-effacing people free to do and, according to their inner dictates, what should they be? (220.2)

They are free to do things for others and should be the ultimate of helpfulness, generosity, considerateness, understanding, sympathy, love, and sacrifice.

They are very willing to sacrifice themselves, their families, and their friends while they spend resources helping others who often take advantage of their neurosis.

21. What two shoulds are closely intertwined in the self-effacing mind? (220.2)

Love and sacrifice

22. How do self-effacing types feel about aggressive, arrogant, or vindictive traits in others? (220.3)

They abhor these traits, but also secretly or openly adore them indiscriminately.

They must adore these qualities in order to feel integrated within themselves, but they must also abhor these qualities in order to support their pride in their own saintliness compared to that of mastery types.

23. What plays a great part in the morbid dependency of this type? (220.3–221.1)

Disavowing their own pride and aggressiveness but admiring those qualities in others.

Morbid means unhealthy or unwholesome.

0:30/0:30 WI

24. As self-effacing people become strong enough to face their conflict, what puts them under a constant crossfire? (221.2)

Their expansive drives come into sharper focus, and the conflict between their expansive drives and self-effacing qualities put them under a constant crossfire.

They become prey to conflicting shoulds. For example, they know that they should employ their expansive tendencies and be more assertive, but they also should be consistently loving and lovable.

Students have said:

- "I call it 'DIYD squared'—damned if you do, damned if you don't."
- "Trying to separate a self-effacing person from their suffering is difficult; it's like coming between an addict and their drug."

Self-effacing types don't know that they are generating their own suffering. If you wish to help them, ask them how you can help in order to place on their own shoulders the responsibility for making choices. Set boundaries about your options if they want you to 'co-sign' for their suffering (to co-sign means to take responsibility either for causing their suffering or for rescuing them from their suffering).

You can participate in their need to suffer by behaving in untrustworthy or hurtful ways, or by enabling their suffering through taking responsibility for their suffering, rescuing them, or sheltering them from the consequences of their choices. The self-effacing type is the “temple-jumper”. Sometimes we have to let them jump and thump.

25. How do self-effacing types solve their early conflicts with people? (221.5)

By moving toward others.

In KF we call them the “pullers”, pulling people toward them.

26. To gain affection of a kind, what price does this child pay? (222.1)

The price of self-subordinating devotion.

27. What may the self-effacing type experience during adolescence? (222.1)

A period of rebellion, combined with a hectic and compulsive ambition.

If these trends in adolescence are not expressed, they may emerge at any other stage of life. A self-effacing woman in her fifties can suddenly rebel against doing anything for her family, or a man in his forties can start spending money, quit his job, divorce, or look for another peer group.

28. What characteristics of the self-effacing child’s early environment strike you? (222.1)

Open this question to the group.

- They grow up under the shadow of someone (e.g., preferred sibling, beautiful mother, despotic father) to whom they show self-subordinating devotion
- Pleasing and appeasing a dominant sibling to gain their fondness and protection
- Relinquish fighting spirit in favor of need for affection
- Hypersensitivity to hostile tension—they try to smooth things over
- Try to win people over by cultivating qualities that would make them acceptable and lovable
- Suppression of rebellion and ambition

29. The idealized image of a self-effacing person is primarily a composite of what qualities? (222.2)

- “Lovable” qualities such as unselfishness, goodness, generosity, humility, saintliness, nobility, and sympathy
- Helplessness, suffering, and martyrdom are glorified
- A premium is placed on their feelings; having deep feelings is part of their image.

30. What begins the shrinking process that leaves the self-effacing person feeling small and helpless? (223.1)

Leaning over backward to eradicate any trace of a conscious feeling of pride.

They do and feel things that to them appear saintly or loving, but they are actually protecting their pride.

Intention is all important and their intention to be loving is enough for them to feel right about their actions, no matter what those actions might mean for others. This need to appear saintly to others and to themselves and to maintain their victim status is very irritating and frustrating for others.

They want others to appreciate that their “heart” or intention is always GOOD, no matter what they actually do.

31. The weakness of the self-effacing solution lies in what two factors? (223.2)

- A. The shrinking process.
- B. The way in which the taboos on expansiveness renders the self-effacing neurotic a helpless prey to self-hate.

32. Why does self-hate seem more vicious in this type than in other kinds of neurosis? (224.3)

Because they are more helpless against it.

The effective means to ward off self-hate that are available to the expansive type are not available to the self-effacing type.

33. Why can't self-effacing people stave off self-accusation, accuse others, or express any kind of hostility? (224.4–225.1)

- Taboos on arrogance and conceit keep them from using self-righteousness as a defense.
- They should not have negative feelings toward others because they should be understanding and forgiving.
- Because of their taboos on aggression, accusing others or any kind of hostility toward others would be frightening.
- They need others so much that they have to avoid friction.
- They are not good fighters.

They anticipate self-hate if they were ever to confront others, and the fear of self-hate stops them from trying. They feel overwhelming guilt if they try to fight, and they must avoid anything that might generate a feeling of guilt.

A self-effacing woman stood up for her faith in a therapy session. She berated herself later for being offensive and harsh. Afterwards she listened to a recording of the session and heard herself speaking clearly, compassionately, and thoughtfully. She felt so guilty for standing up for herself that she rewrote the history of her effort to her own disadvantage in order to justify her feelings of self-contempt.

34. How does this type behave toward people when feeling attacked? (225.2)

- They try to placate and take the edge off of accusations by, for instance, an overeager admission of guilt.
- They try to elicit sympathetic reassurance by being apologetic and by expressing remorse and self-reproaches.
- They plead for mercy by emphasizing their own helplessness.
- They exaggerate in their minds their feelings of guilt, their helplessness, and their being badly off in every way – in short, they emphasize their suffering.

This makes self-effacing types dishonest. They ask forgiveness readily, not because they have violated some thought-out principle but only to restore a pseudo-sense of “togetherness”.

35. How do self-effacing people show passive externalization? (225.3)

They feel accused, suspected or neglected, kept down, treated with contempt, abused, exploited, or treated with outright cruelty.

If others do not perform “correctly”, the self-effacing person perceives it as a personal assault.

They exaggerate any hurt done to them and use the hurt as fuel to maintain their rage.

They feel cheated, misunderstood, and under-appreciated, and resent those they are trying to help.

0:45/0:45 WI

36. Self-effacing people feel profoundly insecure, so what old pattern must they follow to strengthen their inner position? (226.1)

They reach out for others to strengthen their inner position by giving them the feeling of being accepted, approved of, needed, wanted, liked, loved and appreciated. Their salvation lies in others.

It is difficult to live with self-effacing types because they believe that enmeshment is the way to strengthen a relationship. If another person's motives or reality have nothing to do with the self-effacing neurotic, that person's reality or motives become a threat. For example, if my husband is cleaning the car, I might assume he is doing it for me. If I find out that he is doing it for himself, I might feel neglected or imagine that he has someone else in mind and feel threatened.

37. What makes it impossible for the self-effacing type to be discriminating? (226.2)

The compulsiveness of their expectations.

They cannot distinguish between genuine friendliness and its many counterfeits. Any warmth or friendliness from others means that others are trustworthy.

A self-effacing woman could not see for herself the abuse that she endured in a certain relationship, but when she became pregnant, she suddenly realized that the relationship was dangerous and cut it off. She could see how unhealthy the relationship was for her child, but she could not see it for herself.

38. What does this type persistently and unrealistically expect from others? (227.1)

They persist in expecting good from others, consciously or unconsciously.

39. What do the great emotional needs of self-effacing people override? (227.1)

Their great emotional needs override evidence.

One student said, "I persist in my crazy behaviors because I believe that good will always come out of it, and I conveniently forget the times when it doesn't. I think that I am so spiritual and favored by God that I can ignore cause and effect or common sense and still be taken care of."

40. Does this type have a real faith in mankind? (227.1)

No, they have a Pollyanna attitude, which inevitably brings with it many disappointments and makes them more insecure with people.

Self-effacing types have a blind hope that everything will magically happen to their advantage, so it is doubly shocking and painful when the hard knocks of life shatter their illusions. They use their experience to confirm their own inadequacies, which generates an even stronger longing to merge with a strong, capable, partner or to merge with a strong organization or cause.

After some correspondence through a dating site, a self-effacing woman sent money to help a man who appealed to her for help. He was a fraud, of course. She will believe in someone on a dating site, but she will not order anything online for fear that someone will steal money from her. Her fear of online shopping helps her remain incompetent in an increasingly online world.

41. What needs of the self-effacing person are described here? (227.2–228.2)

- A. Must feel accepted by others
- B. Need human contact and company
- C. Need others to give meaning and zest to whatever they are doing
- D. Need someone to rely on them and someone to things do things for
- E. Need help and plenty of it

42. What does this type's need for help amount to? (228.2)

The need amounts to the expectation that everything will be done for them.

They can't learn to help themselves because that is expansive. If they make any effort on their own behalf and fail, their failure feels like a punishment for having tried. This makes KF training very difficult. KF is about making efforts on one's own behalf.

43. What is an intrinsic part of the self-effacing solution? (228.2)

Love.

This isn't the kind of love that the Bible talks about. Self-effacing love is very vulnerable, which makes the self-effacing person fearful. Anything another person does can be interpreted as "losing love".

44. Upon what do self-effacing people base their claims? (229.2)

Their claims are based on their endeavors to make themselves agreeable and useful.

They overrate what they do for others. They imagine that their services are very valuable, indispensable, and worthy of affection and gratitude, so they feel justified to make indiscriminate demands as a return. This service of love is not based on what the other person actually wants but on what the self-effacing person feels capable of offering and imagines is valuable.

45. Why does suffering affect this type in a much deeper way? (229.3)

Because they must primarily prove to themselves, to their own satisfaction, that they are entitled to the fulfillment of their needs.

They depend on others to fulfill their needs and make them feel better about themselves. They cannot fulfill their needs themselves without breaking taboos, so they have to exaggerate their suffering in order to justify their demands on others.

46. What is a more unconscious and more destructive basis for self-effacing claims? (229.4–230.1)

Feeling abused and being entitled to have others make up for the injuries perpetrated on them.

Martyr points—any inconvenience from others can be turned into demands later on.

Often a self-effacing type will make demands based on what they "would" do for others. If they believe that they would something for you, then you should do it for them. This arbitrary imposition makes relationships difficult.

47. In a few words, how would the author describe the self-effacing type? (230.2)

A person who craves affection and feels abused most of the time.

48. In what other situation does this type feel abused? (230.3)

When their many unconscious claims are not fulfilled.

KF training can become an excuse for making demands. The self-effacing person may claim that their demands are simply their efforts to “fight for their real self”. They will unconsciously exaggerate their suffering “at the hands of others” so that they can justify their attacks, sulks, complaints, and vindictive behavior.

49. What is the more poignant source of abuse that self-effacing people suffer? (230.4)

The abuse they inflict on themselves through self-minimizing, self-reproaches, self-contempt, and self-torture—all of which is externalized.

Externalized means that they perceive this abuse as coming from others and from life.

50. Why do self-effacing types need to defend their victim role? (231.1)

Because feeling victimized protects them against self-hate; the victim role is a strategic position.

One student said: “I cannot accept that I did anything wrong when a relationship is damaged, so I adopt the victim role: it’s someone else’s fault that this happened. Blaming others protects me from hurt pride.”

0:55/0:55 WI

51. Why might these people provoke others to treat them badly? (231.2)

They must transfer their inner scene to the outside world.

By provoking others to treat them badly, they transfer the inner scene of chronic self-abuse to the outside world and thus become the noble victim suffering under an ignoble and cruel world.

They feel victimized by a person that they themselves have actually failed or victimized out of their own neurotic feelings.

When they begin to heal, the “wrong” done to them feels less harmful or demeaning and they can recognize how they were participating in the situation. They can begin to look at their participation without self-condemnation.

52. What is the greatest stumbling block to seeing and experiencing the inner conflict for which self-effacement is a solution? (232.1)

Feeling abused.

The more you try to point out their inner conflicts, the more they feel abused by you.

Self-effacing types aren’t able to recognize when they are actually being abused or mistreated. Feeling abused and hysterically reacting is different from knowing when you are being abused and then doing something about it.

53. Against whom do self-effacing types turn when they feel resentment? (232.2)

They not only turn against others but simultaneously against themselves.

The sudden antagonism can be rather shocking and scary for themselves and for everyone around them.

54. What is this type’s most characteristic way of expressing vindictive resentment? (232.3)

Through suffering.

Suffering then becomes an excuse for their outbursts.

55. What other function does suffering acquire for this type? (233.1)

The function of absorbing rage and making others feel guilty as a way of getting back at them.

The only satisfying apology from others is to see them grovel and admit their base inferiority, but since even that is never enough to restore pride, the self-effacing neurotic is never satisfied. They then exaggerate the abuse and their feelings about it to explain why the apology was not enough or wasn't done right.

56. What kind of environment is favorable for self-effacing neurotics? (233.3)

An environment that does not tax them beyond what, in their inhibitions, they can do, and that affords such a measure of satisfaction as, according to their structure, they need and can allow themselves.

Examples from Dr Horney's book:

- Leading a life dedicated to others or a cause.
- A life where they can lose themselves by being useful and helpful, and feel needed, wanted and liked.

57. For the self-effacing type, what are some of the functions of neurotic suffering? (234.3–235.4)

- A. Suffering becomes the basis for claims and entitlements
- B. Suffering is a way of expressing vindictiveness
- C. Uses suffering to accuse others and excuse self
- D. Uses suffering to assuage self-accusation and ward off the possible reproaches of others
- E. Suffering entitles them to "understanding"
- F. Suffering provides an alibi for not making more of life and not achieving ambitious goals
- G. Suffering supports the unconscious determination to go to pieces

Suffering provides self-effacing types with an excuse for refusing to work on their development and health. They want others to pay for their suffering. They may need to tell everyone all their mistakes and present themselves as a mess, quit KF or threaten to do so, proclaim their unworthiness, feel judged by God, and forget all the progress they have made.

They would lose their position of "strength" if they learned to live without the suffering. Using suffering to manipulate others is the only strength they know, so they have to exaggerate the suffering or the offense in order to strengthen their position as a suffering, yet noble, victim.

It can feel very unfair to mastery and resigned types when self-effacing types are held up as saints.

58. Suffering per se appears as the proof of what? (236.3)

A proof of nobility.

Per se (Latin) means "in itself".

59. What must take place before this type can dispense with these functions of neurotic suffering? (236.4–237.1)

A radical change in the whole character structure.

They have to move into a world they have never known before. It is very frightening, and courage is not one of their natural strengths. They need to know that if they change, someone will be there to help them.

The process of radically changing their lives is extremely frightening for these people. They have to give up everything they have depended on and literally throw themselves into the storm of life without any skills to cope with reality. They must exercise more courage than other neurotic types, but this courage often arises out of desperation. Letting go of their attachment to and dependence on others is like letting go of a life raft.

60. Self-effacing people may arouse resentment, but what do they really need? (238.2)

Sympathetic understanding.

They need encouragement and support while they learn new ways to communicate and to make choices.

Mastery and resigned types can play the suffering card to get their way, too, but it is not their card of preference. They would rather try other strategies first.
