KF Introduction to NHG

Chapter 6: *Alienation from Self*¹

“The Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost.”² The Son of Man is Jesus, who is the perfect model for human beings. He inquires after, hunts for and seeks, requires, and even demands what has been lost, and we are to follow His example. His mission is to rescue and then keep safe the lost thing, which we believe is a person—your real self.

Kidnapping and ransom demands plagued all the affluent families in first century Rome. Those who were kidnapped became slaves or simply languished in captivity with small hope of rescue, unless someone paid the huge price of time and resources required to find and redeem them. Finding and redeeming the real self requires a similarly great effort. In the beginning of our recovery, we must redirect what seems like an exorbitant amount of our time and energy to seek and to save, or rescue, that which was lost.

When we are committed to saving the life of our idealized self, we cannot have a genuine connection with Jesus. The idealized self is far too vulnerable and shallow to allow for the kind of reality that Jesus requires in a relationship. He is, after all, the Truth, and as neurotics, we are afraid of the truth. We may think that we are in relationship with Him, but then why are we so often anxious, angry, self-defensive, and subject to self-sabotage? We will sacrifice our potential and even the well-being of others to save our idealized lives. Any interference with our search for glory is perceived as a threat—and Jesus is a big threat to the idealized self. He just won’t give up until He has established with His own creature a real relationship that allows Him to reveal the truth about who He designed that creature to be.

When Nancy first read Neurosis and Human Growth in 1998, she recognized the pride of the idealized self in her theological beliefs, her words, and in everything she did, especially in her ministry. She realized that she had rebelled against her Creator by trying to avoid the hard work of becoming the glorious creature He designed her to be. Instead, she tried to make herself in her own image and then presented that self to Jesus like the people in Matthew 7:23 who said, “See, Jesus, see, aren’t I special? I’m doing all these wonderful things, and in Your name, too!” Yet Jesus will reply to those people, “Depart from Me, I never knew you.” In our neurosis, there is very little to know; we are lost—and we will never find ourselves if in our pride we choose to remain alienated from Him.

When we make the decision to co-labor with Jesus in the difficult work of seeking and rescuing our real self, we can be confident that He will guide and support us. We can trust Him. He created us and He knows how to find us. Think of the shepherd who goes searching for his lost lamb. When he rescues the one that he recognizes as his own, he feels great joy. You, also, will feel great joy when you catch glimpses of your real self, for only from that real person can the rivers of living water flow.³

1. What is the real self? (155.1)

The alive, unique, personal center of ourselves; the only part that can and wants to grow.

The real self is the person God created, the person Jesus died for and redeemed.

We are sometimes upset that God is not interested in supporting and glorifying the idealized self.

When you were born again in Jesus, you were reborn as your real self, connected to God and flowing in harmony with His Creation. Now that we are born again, our job is to train that real self into its marvelous potential.

We were created to be like healthy babies, eager to grow and learn.

2. In the “devil’s pact”, what corresponds to the abandoning of the real self? (155.3)

Selling one’s soul.

Jesus asks us to consider what profit there is in gaining the whole world but losing our own souls. (Mark 8:34-38). The world encompasses our ideas about what would make us safe and happy, what we imagine would bring us fulfillment. By selling our real, beautiful soul to become a slave to our idealized search for glory, we build our house on sand (Matt. 7:24-27) Our own imagined version of ourselves seems like a better idea than the person God created.

1 Corinthians 13:1-3 describes the ministry options for which we might sell our souls. This is Nancy's translation of that passage:

If I speak with the languages of people, and even angels, but I do not have agape love, I become a noisy confusing metal thing, or a clanging cymbal. And if I have the gift of interpreting the will of the gods, and I know all mysteries and everything there is to know, and have all trust so that I can alter or transfer mountains, but I do not have love, then I myself am nothing, a nobody. And if I support everything with my possessions and hazard or risk my whole person in order that I may boast (or be consumed), and I do not have love, there is no advantage to me.

3. When we are alienated from our self, what becomes impaired? (156.2)

The general capacity for conscious experience.

Our present American epidemic of gadgets, devices, and media distracts us from being conscious of ourselves.

4. Through neurosis, what parts of our material self can become alienated? (156.3)

The body and possessions.

We are unable to own our body, listen to it, and care for it as part of who we are, and we refuse to acknowledge its limitations or explore its real capabilities. We might think that our bodies are evil or an obstacle and therefore must be resisted.

Our possessions or money may not feel like they are really ours, and there may seem to be no connection between our work or our choices and what we have. We may have no sense of stewardship. We spend money but without any sense of why we are spending it or how much we are spending. Perhaps we can't spend because we don't know what the money is for. We fill up our houses and closets with stuff and don't know how or why it happened.

5. List the characteristics of the phenomenon that is at the core of this alienation from the actual self? (157.2)

- A. Remoteness from one's own feelings, wishes, beliefs, and energies
- B. Loss of the feeling of being an active determining force in one's own life
- C. Loss of feeling oneself as an organic whole

We might attach to other sources to feel congruent and give ourselves a feeling of identity and stability. We attach to other people, jobs, experiences, groups, and beliefs in order to counterfeit an internal experience or to feel motivated and secure. Our lives become a series of reactions to internal and external pressures that help us feel functional.

6. What are some of the things that this alive center of our real self provides? (157.2)

- Palpitating inward life
- Spontaneity of feeling – joy, yearning, love, anger, fear, despair
- Spontaneous interests and energies

- Capacity to wish and to will
- The desire to expand and fulfill ourselves
- Spontaneous reactions to our feelings or thoughts: welcoming or opposing, appropriating or disowning, striving with or against, saying yes or no
- Ability to make decisions and assume responsibility for them
- Genuine integration and a sound sense of wholeness, or oneness

Nancy would also add trustworthiness. When we develop the real self, we gain integrity and are able to act consistently and congruently with our values. We start responding to life in a way that continually supports our integrity. Once we get into the joy of growing, we find that chaos, dishonesty, and incongruence assault our well-being. We just don't want to live there anymore.

7. When strong and active, what does our real self enable us to do and with what result? (157.2)

Our real self enables us to make decisions and assume responsibility for them. Not only are our body and mind, deed and thought or feeling, consonant and harmonious, but they function without serious inner conflict (and with little or no attendant strain).

Like a great golf swing, much more power with much less effort.

8. What is the "actual self"? (158.1)

The all-inclusive term for everything that a person is at a given time.

The actual self is everything that we are in the moment – healthy and neurotic, wise and foolish, messed up and functioning, with all of those aspects in motion, moving in one direction or another through our own choices.

9. What is the "idealized self"? (158.1)

What we are in our irrational imagination, or what we should be according to the dictates of our neurotic pride.

10. What is the "real self"? (158.1)

The original force toward individual growth and fulfillment, with which we may again achieve full identification when freed from the crippling shackles of neurosis.

The self that God created and designed, that He redeemed and wants to train. If we try to be a duck when we are designed to be a peacock, we will find that swimming wastes a lot of our energy. Submitting to our design and exploring the potential of that design is an essential part of our healing.

0:30/1:10 WI

11. How do we know when we have felt or glimpsed the real or possible self? (158.1)

The real or possible self feels more real, more certain, more definitive than anything else. We observe the real self in ourselves when, after some incisive insight, there is a release from the grip of compulsive needs.

We are able to choose from various possibilities without feeling strain. Strain lets us know that our search for glory is threatened by whatever situation is before us. When we start to glimpse our possible self, we become willing to explore who we are in a situation, rather than to focus on avoiding self-hate. We are able to step back emotionally from an event and look at it for what it is, without attendant judgment and fear. There is an absence of chronic hurt, shame, humiliation, and wrath. We feel integrated and are willing to defend that integrity. We are free to extend compassion to others rather than needing them to be a certain way.

12. Describe the despair we experience when we've lost our real self. (158.2–159.1)

It is “sickness unto death”; it is despair at not being conscious of having a self, or despair at not being willing to be ourselves.

During a book study or a healing session, Nancy will often hear people say that they do not know who they are anymore. The reality is that they never did know. They only knew the illusion that they had of themselves. So, recognizing that they don't know who they are is a huge step forward toward discovering themselves.

The person who has lost their real self may not experience despair, but their soul is starving. They will attribute that sense of deprivation or unfulfillment to some external circumstance, event, or person. We can see the evidence of starving souls when people are chronically working to meet their own compelling needs and are easily tossed around by their emotions and cravings. Jesus came to save that which was lost, but we don't see that our soul is lost. We only see our problems.

We may wonder whether we are saved because secretly we hoped that Jesus would save our idealized self. We hoped that He would save the wrong person.

13. The very compulsive character of neurotic drives deprives a person of what? (159.2)

It deprives the person of their full autonomy and spontaneity.

The neurotic's pseudo-solutions, though representing attempts at integration, also deprive the neurotic of autonomy and spontaneity.

We might feel that others are pushing us around or that they are relentless and unyielding, when actually we, out of our neurosis, have chosen to give up our autonomy and spontaneity.

14. Through what active moves is alienation furthered? (159.3 and 160.3)

- A. Active moves away from the real self – the whole search for glory
- B. Active moves against the real self – expressed in self-hate

By actively moving away from the real self, we are determined and driven by shoulds to mold ourselves into something we are not. By actively moving against the real self, we treat our real self like a condemned convict, despised and constantly threatened with destruction. The idea of being our real self becomes loathsome and terrifying. Nancy believes that many of our nightmares reflect this terror of an emerging real self.

15. Through our neurotic claims, we insist that others do what? (159.3)

We insist that others should adjust to us.

You might notice how often you want others to adjust to you. Awareness is a big step toward health.

16. What is the outcome of insisting that others should be responsible for us? (160.1)

Our constructive energies lie fallow, and we are less and less a determining factor in our own life.

We become dependent on institutions, government, or others to do things for us, support us, and make us feel satisfied. We are no longer grateful for the support we have but consider ourselves entitled to it. Our dependence on others feeds our anxiety and lowers our self-esteem because at any time the support could be withdrawn – and our constructive energies are dormant. It's this vicious cycle of demanding support and then allowing constructive energies to lie fallow that creates the necessity to demand more support.

17. How does neurotic pride move us away from our real self? (160.2)

We become ashamed of what we actually are – our feelings, resources, and activities – so we actively withdraw our interest from ourselves.

Externalizing the despair by wanting or longing to be someone else is neurotic envy.

When we move away from our real self, we withdraw our interest in other people. Losing interest in the people around us reflects our own lack of interest in ourselves. We become anxious about the truth about ourselves and others because the truth might hurt our pride, so we withdraw our attention. We might even walk away from people who have invested in us because they have invested in someone we hate.

In a trustworthy community we can find the reflection that we need for knowing ourselves. Others can help us see more clearly who we are and how life actually is. Without that reflection we are left to wander in our own illusions and, unfortunately, many people prefer to wander. The Bible is quite clear about that (John 3:19-20).

18. What becomes loathsome and terrifying for the neurotic? (160.3)

The idea of being oneself.

We want to avoid any uncomfortable evidence of who we actually are, so we have an unconscious interest in blurring the truth about ourselves.

Our longings for something or someone may be a means of avoiding the difficult work of investing energy in our own development. We might waste energy avoiding activities that are emotionally challenging, such as the NHG study, because they remind us of our neurotic despair.

Rather than just being who we are, we get focused on knowing who we are while still refusing to accept the evidence that is continually presented to us. The popularity of non-therapeutic personality tests demonstrates how pervasive these pseudo-solutions are. A marketing label that we can attach to ourselves supports our pride in “knowing”. The label gives our fractured neurotic self an identity and a shallow idea of who we are. When you become who you really are, you will not need to know, you will just experience the wonder of it.

19. Why is alienation a devitalizing process? (161.2)

Because it is depersonalizing.

Jesus invites us into a personal relationship with God and the community. This is one of the many reasons why Christianity is so healthy for us. God is the great Parent that all of us need, and it is within that energizing relationship that we become real persons.

20. What ultimately governs feelings for a neurotic? (162.2)

Pride governs feelings.

Only the feelings that we are proud of are allowed.

The patient could not consider being guided by another person because he was proud of what he considered to be an independent spirit. He realized that if he gave up his illusion of independence, his self-esteem would collapse.

21. When a neurotic suffers, who is mainly suffering? (163.2)

The proud self.

Hurt pride increases the suffering we may be experiencing. We might have physical problems, which alone are painful enough, but then we increase our suffering by adding the suffering of hurt pride and self-hate – because, according to our legal system, we shouldn't have those problems. Or we may experience the suffering of a broken relationship and then add to our suffering by believing that we should not have a broken relationship or experience rejection. Limitations of any kind feel much more painful when, at the same time, we hate ourselves for experiencing a limitation.

In our suffering we might claim that others have hurt us, when in reality their actions or words did not hurt us – they hurt our pride. A person could say the same things to two different people. One will feel hurt and the other will not. The difference depends on how much pride a person has invested in the issue.

22. What can true suffering alone do for us? (163.3)

True suffering broadens and deepens our range of feelings and opens our hearts for the suffering of others.

True suffering can help us feel some sympathy for ourselves and motivate us to do something constructive.

When we understand another's suffering because we ourselves have suffered, we are more trustworthy and better equipped to help another person heal.

The letter from James in the New Testament teaches us to remain under the testing that suffering brings. True suffering has a goal or purpose. If we can give up our pride and cooperate with our suffering, we will achieve that purpose. We can learn to see trials as opportunities to strengthen our endurance, which is necessary for making us "complete, lacking nothing". The training offered through true suffering helps us become unified within ourselves and equips us for life. (James 1:2-4)

True suffering reveals the quality of our trust, endurance, courage, and connection to reality. When we indulge in self-pity, we disconnect from reality and create more suffering by judging life and others as unfair, developing a victim mentality, and choosing powerlessness.

Suffering also teaches us to be grateful for what we have; it helps wean us away from our focus on what we do not have.

23. How does a general impoverishment of the emotional life show itself? (164.2)

- Diminished sincerity – which makes neurotics untrustworthy; they are incongruent
- Diminished spontaneity and depth of feelings – which makes neurotics boring and stagnant

- Restricted range of possible feelings – the few feelings they have are often unreasonable and intense

24. Our conscious attitude toward the disturbance of emotional dearth may be expressed in what ways? (164.3)

- We may not regard emotional dearth as a disturbance but as something to be proud of
- We may be seriously concerned about increasing emotional deadness
- We may realize that feelings have an increasingly reactive character
- We may be unaware of any impoverishment

25. In what ways might existing emotional impoverishment be camouflaged? (164.3–165.3)

- Displaying a scintillating vivacity and false spontaneity; the need to impress others; being easily enthused or discouraged and easily incited to love or anger, but their feelings have no depth; chameleonlike – they play a role and produce the feelings that go with it.
- Need for thrill and excitement.
- The range of feelings is restricted and toned down – automatically feeling what inner dictates say we should feel or reacting with the feelings we believe that others expect of us.

We might create a crisis or dig a pit of problems for ourselves so that by scrambling out of the problem we can feel alive and proud.

If we feel a need for thrills or are restricting our feelings, we may suddenly live recklessly and create problems that force us to gamble again or motivate us to take some other form of reckless action.

Using charged vocabulary to create more drama: “This is killing me!” rather than “This is really difficult.” We might think that it’s good to feel financial stress because then we learn to rely on God, but we are unwilling to accept that we created our own financial stress because we are energized by the thrill and drama of the gamble.

26. What is one of the main characteristics of neurosis? (166.1)

The shift of energies from developing the given potentials of the real self to developing the fictitious potentials of the idealized self.

We actually behave in ways, think in ways, and believe in ways that do not promote our own or anyone else’s healing, growth, or development.

A tremendous amount of creative energy is available to us when we withdraw from investing in our idealized self and our search for glory and, instead, invest effort in building up the real self. The real self is the source of all that unique creative energy. It needs to be strong and dominant to fulfill its purpose which is to declare the glory of God.

27. What are the two implications of the shift in energies characteristic of neurosis? (166.2-3)

- The more energies absorbed in the service of the pride system, the fewer available for the constructive drive toward self-realization.
- The inability to feel our energies as our own; we have the feeling of not being a moving force in our own life.

We do not value the real attributes we have that would declare God's glory. We will not recognize them and, therefore, cannot train them. We will not invest in our real attributes, and we may actually resist them. In our minds, only what we should have is valuable. When we become content to be who we were designed to be, we have little basis for pride. We can choose humility and invite God to be our ally. (James 4:6-10)

28. Which of these weakened directive powers do you notice in your life? (166.2–168.2)

Open this question to the group. Examples from the book are in bold.

- An insufficient sense of direction; personal direction is replaced by idealized standards
- Leaving the direction of my life to others; complying with or rebelling against others
- Anxiety resulting from the abandonment of accustomed neurotic aids
- Not moved by his own values and aspirations but by the needs evolving from his pride system
- No plan or purpose; go where their fancy takes them
- Futile daydreaming takes the place of directed activities
- Cynicism chokes ideals
- Indecision may prohibit any purposeful functioning
- Caught between contradictory shoulds

29. When directive powers are impaired or lost, what is another clearly discernible insufficiency? (168.3)

The faculty of assuming responsibility for oneself.

We want others, the government, institutions, God, or life to take care of our physical needs, feelings, experiences, and the consequences of our choices.

30. What makes it close to impossible to assume the only responsibility that matters – plain, simple honesty about ourselves and our lives? (169.3)

Pride has taken over responsibility and hounds us with condemnatory accusations when we fail to do the impossible.

31. In what three ways does plain, simple honesty about ourselves and our lives operate? (169.3)

- A. A square recognition of being as we are without minimizing or exaggerating
- B. A willingness to bear the consequences of our actions, decisions, etc., without trying to 'get by' or put the blame on others
- C. Realizing that it is up to us to do something about our difficulties without insisting that others, fate, or time solve them for us.

We may unconsciously interfere with our children's development in plain, simple honesty because we are not willing, or have not yet learned, to be honest ourselves.

32. Since taking responsibility for oneself does not preclude getting help, what does it imply? (169.3)

Getting all the help we possibly can.

This is a form of humility: to become a learner, to consider the guidance of others and to trust in the guidance of God.

33. Even the best help from outside will not avail if the neurotic does not do what? (169.3)

Make efforts toward a constructive change.

KF was developed to offer tools and training to those who are willing to make the effort to change.

1:05/1:35 WI

34. Drawing from Dr. Horney's examples and your own experience, list some of the ways that you or others shift responsibility? (169.4–171.1)

Open this question to the group. Examples from the book are in bold.

- Overspending is someone else's fault
- The tendency to feel abused
- Forcing others to come to the rescue
- Believing oneself to be immune to cause and effect
- Discarding the evidence that one's own choices have produced a particular outcome
- Mastery: "Others are frustrating. If they would only do what I tell them, everything would be fine . . . When I fail, it is someone else's fault. Circumstances were against me."
- Self-effacing: "No one loves me. I'm lonely. That's why I feel like I do and that's why I do what I do. I eat this food because they are giving it to me, even though I know it isn't good for me."
- Resigned: "This isn't my problem, it's your problem. I don't impose my needs on you, so stop imposing yours on me."
- Over-committing ourselves and using busyness as an excuse for not following through
- Creating crises, chaos, or circumstances that force others or ourselves to act in a certain way

All neurotics shift responsibility for their problems to forces outside themselves and look to circumstances and people to resolve their problems.

35. What makes the real self visibly stronger? (171.2)

Every step we take toward assuming responsibility for all of this complex which is our self.

36. As the disintegrating impact of our neurotic conflicts grows, our shoulds with their pride and self-hates acquire what new function? (172.2)

The function of protecting us from chaos.

We are disconnected from our Creator, which makes us feel very vulnerable. As we make neurotic attempts at solving our conflicts, we lose more and more of ourselves and need an artificial means of holding ourselves together.

We can appreciate the hard work that has gone into building up our pride system. We might realize now that we needed it for a time to survive, but now that Jesus has rescued us, found us, and is guiding us home, we can grow out of those old survival patterns and begin living a new life.

"Risk is the tariff we pay for leaving the country of predictable misery." Our unchallenged pride system made the misery predictable, and in that predictability, we found some security.

37. What is created when we are not an active determining factor in our own lives? (172.3)

A deep feeling of uncertainty, no matter how much overlaid by compulsive rigidities.

Even though we often do not consciously feel this deep uncertainty, we know that we are unalive and robbed of true independence. Our outcomes and longings, our diminished ability to engage with reality, and our chronic anxiety tell us that we are living in this condition of uncertainty all of the time.

38. What does the outward direction of our endeavors create for us? (173.2)

It creates a kind of equilibrium and give us a feeling of worth.

We are not too eager to consider changing our neurotic basis of motivation because our pride system creates a kind of equilibrium and supports our self-esteem.

39. What happens when the pride system is undermined? (174.3)

- Instead of being automatically on the defensive, we become interested in the truth about ourselves
- We start to assume responsibility for ourselves: to make decisions, to feel our feelings, to develop our own beliefs
- Functions that were taken over by the pride system regain spontaneity
- Factors of our design and energies are redistributed
- The real self with its constructive forces proves to be the stronger party

We are able to produce more of the Fruit of God's Spirit in our lives. You can find a list of these qualities in Galatians 5:22-23: "But the Fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-temperedness, kindness, goodness, trustworthiness, gentleness, self-management; against such things there is no law."

40. When can the conflict between the pseudo-self and the real self turn into an open battle? (175.1)

When the real self has become active enough for us to risk the battle.

The battle can be hard on the people around us as we start exploring other ways of handling things, perhaps expressing our anger or refusing to use our anger to control others. We have taught others to relate to us in certain ways and now we are changing. Be compassionate on yourself and on them as you go through the process of change.

When we suppress the truth about who we were created to be, we also suppress the truth about God, since He is the One who created us. Our alienation from ourselves is not just our problem; it's a cosmic problem.

1:15/1:45 WI

All subgroups return to the main group for discussion and closing by pressing 3.

Here are some discussion questions:

- Are there any comments or questions?
- Have you ever felt like you don't know who you really are, or don't know what would make you happy?
- If you were not alienated from yourself, how might your life be different?
- How might living out of your real self support God's purposes, your community, and your own life?
- Has anyone begun to experience the "open battle" with the idealized self (e.g., confusion, anxiety, nightmares, an increase in addictive behaviors)?

If time permits, discuss Matthew 18:1-12.

The little child in this passage could represent the real self that has not yet been molded by the world, the flesh, and the devil (1 John 2:15-17; 1 Peter 5:8; Ephesians 2:3). Jesus is teaching us how to handle the idealized self – cut it off, gouge it out, and enter Heaven, even if we feel crippled for a time. Heaven could begin right now if we would choose to live in complete orientation toward our real self and toward God.

“For the Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost.” (Luke 19:10) That is our business – to seek and save (or make whole) that which has been lost in ourselves. We are not alone in this process; Jesus is helping us. He is seeking the person He originally created us to be. As our real self becomes stronger, we can offer a safe environment to others and give them the opportunity to find their real self. We become partners with Jesus in the great mission of seeking and saving what has been lost.
