

KF Reading Guide

Ch. 7: *General Measures to Relieve Tension*¹

1. What is now the condition of the inner situation? (176.1)
2. What distinguishes the search for glory from normal healthy strivings? (176.1)
3. Alienation from self results in part from what? (177.3)
4. By disavowing the real self the neurotic is trying to avoid what? (177.3)
5. If we suppress one aspect of any conflict and make the other predominant, what results? (177.3)
6. The withdrawing of the real self from the field of action is dictated by what need? (178.2)
7. What must neurotics leading a double life unconsciously do? (178.3)
8. What does the externalization of inner experiences mean? (178.4)
9. Which of Dr. Horney's examples of externalization do you recognize in your own life? (179.1)

10. What is another neurotic tendency? (179.2)
11. Have you experienced any of these, or other, disconnections? (180.2–181.1)
12. What do these three attempts at preserving a semblance of inner peace have in common? (181.2)
- A.
 - B.
 - C.
13. What is the main function of automatic control? (181.2)
14. What is necessary to hold together the discrepant parts of a fragmented, alienated self? (181.3)
15. When also may neurotics become panicky? (182.3)
16. What is the last general measure the author describes? (182.4)
17. The neurotic mind opposes what aspects of ourselves? (183.1)
- A.
 - B.
 - C.
18. In what three ways does the neurotic's belief in the supremacy of the mind serve to release tension, cover up conflicts, and establish a sense of unity? (182.4–185.1)
- A.
 - B.
 - C.

19. Which of the above three methods of relieving tension, covering up conflicts and establishing a semblance of unity do you use most often?
20. What is less tolerable the more we try to manage life with pure intellect? (185.2)
21. What becomes ineffectual when we choose to just “get by” and re-establish a semblance of inner “peace”? (185.2)
22. In what ways do neurotic solutions become a way of life? (186.1)

¹ This reading guide refers to the 1991 edition of Neurosis and Human Growth: The Struggle Toward Self-Realization by Karen Horney, published by W.W. Norton and Company Inc. New York.